Line and Staff

Line and staff لاين او ستاف

- favored by the classical theorists
- based on a military model.
- not so much used today,
- except when referring to line managers,
- The line hierarchy in the structure consists of functions
- managers who are directly concerned in achieving the primary purposes of the organization,
- organization as a whole. ‘Staff ’ in functions

Divisionalized organizations

Divisionalized organizations ويشلي سازمانونه

- first described by Sloan (1967)
- involves structuring the organization into separate divisions
- each concerned with discrete manufacturing, sales, distribution or service functions, or with serving a particular market.
- At group headquarters, functional departments may exist in such areas as finance, planning, personnel, legal and engineering to provide services to the divisions

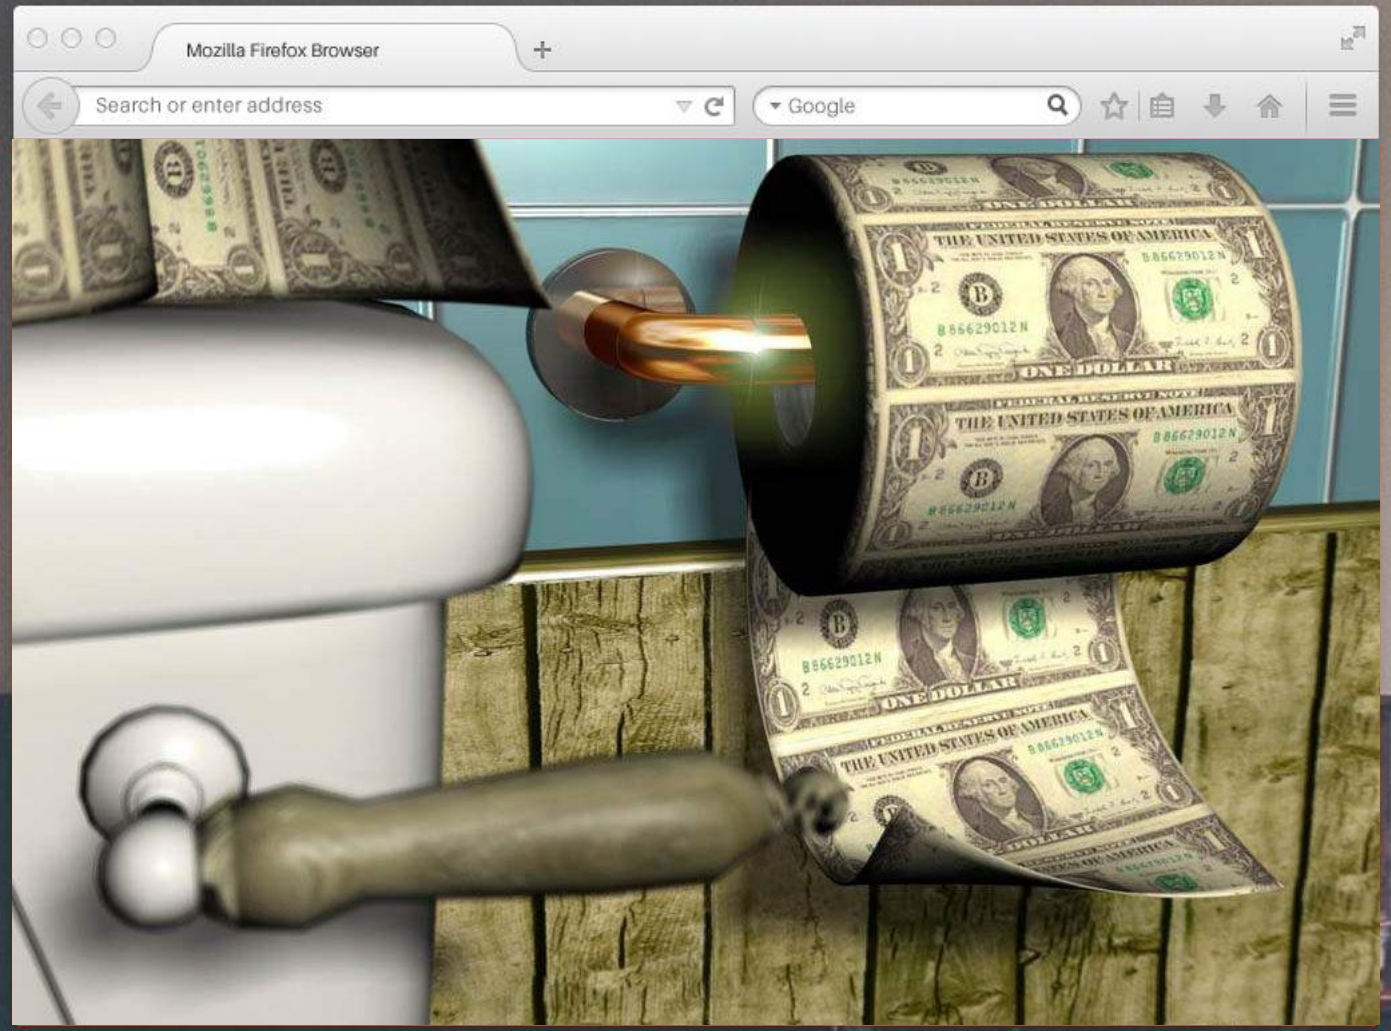

Different Divisions

Decentralized Organizations

Decentralized organizations نا متمرکز سازمانونه

- Some organizations decentralize most of their activities
- retain only a skeleton headquarters staff to deal with financial control matters, strategic planning, legal issues and sometimes, but not always, HR issues,
- especially those concerned with senior management on an across the group or international basis (recruitment, development and remuneration).

Matrix Organizations

Matrix organizations زیلان

- A matrix organization consists of a functional structure
- Thus an employee can be a member of a discipline and of a project team and so have two reporting relationships.
- Matrix organizations are project-based.

Cont.

- Development, design or construction projects will be controlled by project directors or managers.
- Project managers will have no permanent staff except, possibly, some administrative support.
- These individuals are assigned to a project team and they will be responsible to the team leader for delivering the required results
- The most typical form of matrix organization is a large multidiscipline consultancy.

Flexible Organizations

Flexible organizations

ارتجاعي يا نرم سازمانونه

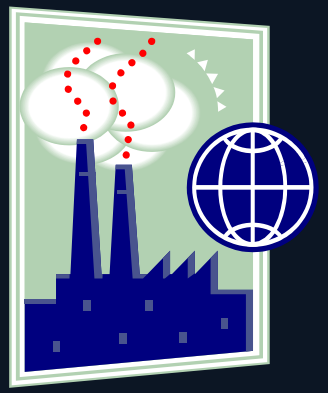

- Flexible organizations may conform broadly to the Mintzberg (1983b) category of an adhocracy in the sense that they are capable of quickly adapting to new demands and operate fluidly.
- An organization may adopt a policy of numerical flexibility, which means that the number of employees can be quickly increased or decreased in line with changes in activity levels. The different types of flexibility are described in.

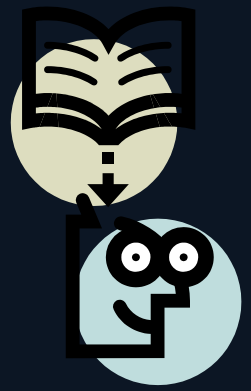

They may be organized as core-periphery organization which consists of three elements:

- 1) the core workers (the central leaf of the shamrock) – professionals, technicians and managers;
- 2) the contractual fringe – contract workers; and
- 3) the flexible labor force consisting of temporary staff.

The process-based organization

The process-based organization فروسیز سازمانونه

- focus is on horizontal processes that cut across organizational boundaries.
- Traditional organization structures consist of a range of functions operating semi-independently and each with its own, usually extended, management hierarchy.
- Functions acted as vertical ‘chimneys’ with boundaries between what they did and what happened next door.
- Continuity of work between functions and the coordination of activities was prejudiced.
- Attention was focused on vertical relationships and authority-based management – the ‘command and control’ structure.

Cont.

- Horizontal processes received relatively little attention.
- This is not a top-down system.
- emphasize of work together
- Team is responsible to answer

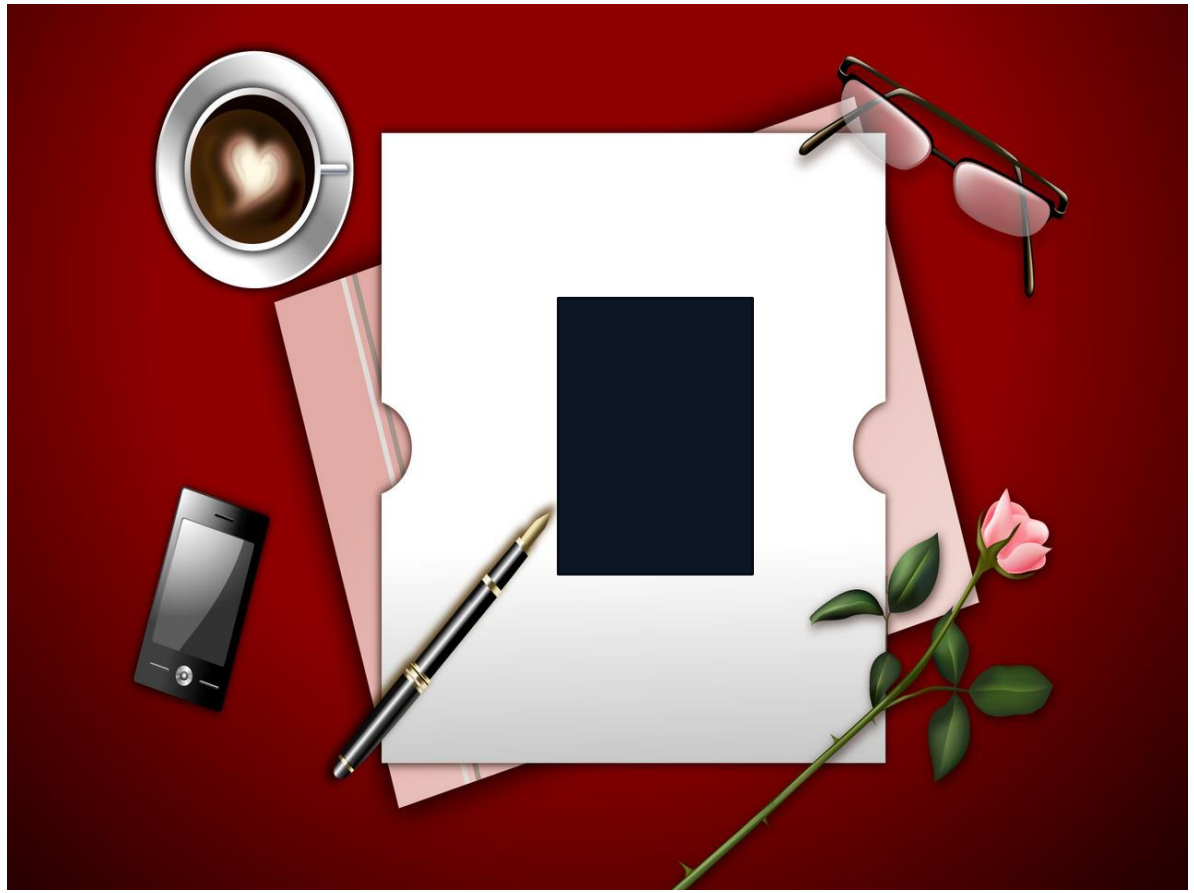

Bureaucracy

Machine bureaucracy,

Professional bureaucracy

Bureaucracy

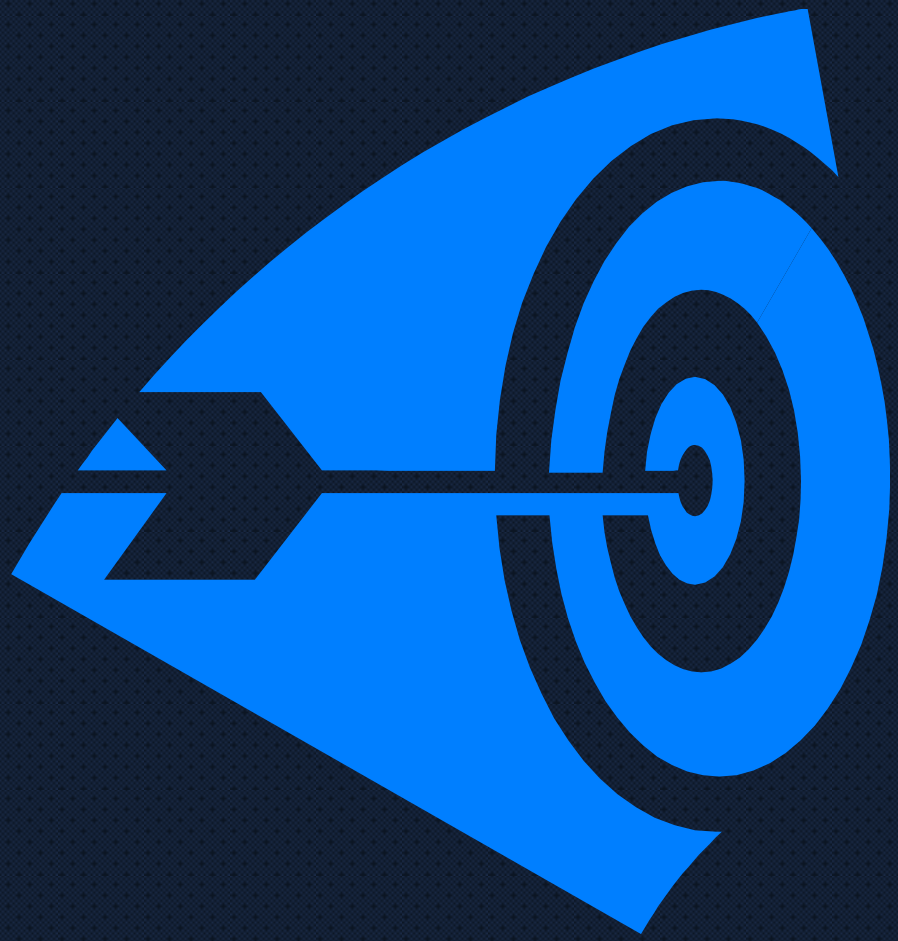

- Machine bureaucracy, which is characterized by the standardization of work processes and the extensive reliance on systems.
- Professional bureaucracy, where the standardization of skills provides the prime coordinating mechanism.
